

First and foremost, Tracey is a mom of two sets of twins; having an autistic son and 29-week preemies are the reasons she entered the field of early intervention. Tracey lives in San Diego with her family and five cats, however, she is originally from NJ and holds a BA in Economics/English and an MBA from Rutgers University, and an MA in Speech-Language Pathology from Montclair State University. Tracey is on an early start eligibility assessment team as well as a seasoned early intervention SLP. She is currently completing a LEND fellowship (Leadership Education in Neurodevelopmental and Other Related Disabilities Program) and is a certified trainer in the Zero to Three Growing Brain curriculum. Tracey strongly believes in advocating for the early intervention community and is a former IDA board member, a member of the CSHA (California Speech Hearing Association) Ad-Hoc Early Intervention Committee, and a member of the San Diego Early Childhood Mental Health Leader's Collaborative. Tracey has had several articles published on screen time and the impacts of Covid on early development, and is an instructor for Summit Professional Development, providing training on autism, early literacy, and screen time.
